Ahhhh .. its around the summer solstice time in the Santa Rosa Range. The wildflowers up high will soon be in full bloom. But alas, the Humboldt-Toiyabe Forest has allowed scads of cows to be turned out and the livestock have already beaten the lower and middle elevations to death and caused large areas to stink like the slime that runs out of cattle hauling semi-trucks. So what to do with all these cows that have already eaten and beaten the ocuntry below - but unleash the bovine scourges on the higher country and its very vulnerable snow bank accumulation areas. This ensures nothing grows there and that erosion is maximized and waster maximally wasted. It's a great opportunity to pollute the headwaters in the northern Great Basin country, and advance erosion rilling, gullyng and general desertification and loss of sustainable water flows.
