

To condemn modern mining practices based on environmental harm from uninformed 19th century methods makes no more sense than criticizing modern medicine for the premature deaths from that same period. While medicine was able to bury its shortcomings immediately and walk away, it is left to our generation to remediate the environmental degradation from these early decades. Such is the case at Stibnite, where good old profit motive meets a problem needing fixing. I support the development of the Stibnite Gold Project by Perpetua Resources as the fastest track to an improved local environment!
