

Dear Sirs,

I reside in the UK but happen to be an investor in the Stibnite Gold Project, alongside many other pre-eminent people. I found out some while back exactly what the project was about and then the history of the area and the neglect that had befallen it after the good had been extracted from the ground and used to create wealth for those during that era, and also how the Antimony as a by product had suddenly become a sought after mineral for use on weapons and various other products. But the world has now moved on and new faces have appeared to put right the wrongs that those many years ago wrought to the environment.

It has to make sense to now go forward with this project, using some of the profit to correct the damage done and restore the area to as close as possible to how it was. A very rare opportunity to right the wrongs of our ancestors. Also of course we have learnt over the past few years that offshoring and bringing in rare earth elements from other countries that see the world differently from ourselves as leaving god fairing people very vulnerable to subjugation.

It has to make sense to allow this project to go ahead, for the environment, for the local population and for those, like myself prepared to invest to make it happen.

COLIN BARRY-SQUIRE