Comments: There are so little old growth and mature forests left in the U.S. and yet these lands are so important for climate resilience, clean air, clean water, and a last resort habitat for many plants and animals. Why are we not protecting these areas? We should not be removing them like some third world country. I want the U.S. Forest Service to use science to manage these lands for future generational use. I would like to see plans that are blueprints for land managers to implement, not open to interpretation. These lands belong to all Americans, not corporations and hedge funds. Isn't it time to implement changes that are relevant to the current climate predicament we are in?
