Comments: Dear Sir,

I am writing in regard to the question of logging in the old growth forests. These forests are the habitat of a myriad of wildlife specimens that depend on these forests for their food, nesting areas and stable environment that these forests provide. The disruption would split the balance of all these species that may take many decades to replicate if ever. These forests contain established varieties of flora that have grown there for hundreds of years and possibly undiscovered species that are found in only these forests. We need to protect these forests for their ability to survive for so long in these places in perpetuity as long as nature permits.

Sincerely,

Marc T. LaComb
