Comments: The Chattahoochee National Forest is quite literally part of my backyard. I live on 200 acres of private and National Forest at a facility that hosts thousands of people every year in retreats and summer camps. Removing the trees behind our home will not only be detrimental to the ecosystem that they provide, but also to the beauty of where our home and camp is. Controlled burns will affect our day-to-day living, including my husband who has asthma. When you arrive in Dahlonega, the first thing you see are the gorgeous spread of mountains. Part of the charm of living here is knowing you live in protected woods. I am absolutely against the government using my backyard to profit off of at the expense of all the people, animals, and ecosystem's expense.
