Comments: I support the Forest Service using the best science available to manage the forest. I know this will make some groups unhappy. The bottom line is wilderness means as little contact with man as possible. The only way to preserve these lands for future generations, just as Gifford Pinchot and Teddy Roosevelt fought for, is to restrict access. This means no bovine. This invasive species should be limited to a few acres of hobby ranchers just like the other novelty animals. I trust the forest service to provide us with a forest that represents the greatest assets that our great country has to offer. We can't see into the future, so to secure these shrinking lands for future generations will take actions that will anger some people. Just as we see the struggle it has taken for us to enjoy what we have today so must the Forest Service keep up the fight for many future generations. Remember there are 400 million Americans who call those forests theirs and billions of people around the world who expect you to do the best job possible to preserve some the world's greatest assets. Remember this is the good fight, lands like these will never be replaced. May all the forces in the universe be with you. Sincerely Terry
