Comments: Re: "Conflict between user groups on public lands" Per your statement in the summary of comments: Notably, many expressed concerns where one use or activity was impacting, straining, or even causing conflict for another resource or use. This gets to the very heart of plan revision: the need to find a long-term, sustainable balance that will reduce conflict between uses while still providing for the rich diversity of opportunities, resources and experiences that the GMUG is known for.

As our population increases and the use of public lands for recreation increases I think that user groups are going to have to learn to share trails and areas where possible. I think the Forest Service must educate people in the area of multi-use and tolerance for other user groups. I believe that trying to accommodate every user group exacerbates the potential for conflict.
