Comments: I would really like option A to remain in place. The main area I ride in Chugach National Forest is the Spencer/Skookum Glacier area. This is a place to ride close to Anchorage that is not too difficult and is a great place to take visitors to our great State who want to experience the backcountry without having to make it a long day. While Turnagain is not too much further from Anchorage, the terrain is more demanding and does not offer much for "tamer" or newer riders.

While some of the options do not have much impact on Spencer/Skookum area, they have a major impact on other areas people like to ride. The more areas that are closed, the more crowded the other areas become. Part of the charm of riding is the independence one has riding on his/her sled and not having to compete with a lot of other riders. Weather and terrain already limit the amount of riding in Chugach National Forest. Further limiting the choices with more restrictions will only be negative for the people who want to experience this area by snowmobile.

Options C and D are completely unacceptable.
