Comments: As an avid snowmobiler that is aiming to ride snowmobiles all across North America, the negative impact that could be seen as a result of this is massive. Although it is personally disappointing, it is economically irresponsible. The money brought in from these riding areas is the big picture. Local small business owners rely on snowmobiles to make ends meet. From gas, to food and even parts, and not limited to even further innovation of the snowmobiling industry, these are all factors that need to be considered for not just future preservation of the land, but the economic structure of those living in or near the Kenai Peninsula. Snowmobilers and other backcountry recreation enthusiasts generally help maintain the land more than they hurt it. Your decision could cause a major downfall for many people local and across the whole country.
