Comments: I have lived in Alaska all my life and grew up enjoying the freedom of miles and miles of public land. I utilized the public land for fishing, hunting, recreation, and also professionally for work. Recently I have spent a lot of time in Washington going to school. The difference in public land access and use is astronomical. There are way fewer areas to access and most of the ones you can you have to pay a fee to access. You have to pay a fee to access public land. Alaska has way more opportunities and freedom than most places in the US. Limiting access to public lands to certain groups is taking away our freedom that Alaskans have grown to love. Taking away access to motorized vehicles will take away a freedom and opportunities for people to enjoy the wilderness that is Alaska. Whether people choose to hike, bike, or use motorized vehicles such as snow machines the people of Alaska should have the right to access their public land. And land should always remain open to public access.
