Comments: 35% of Custer Gallatin National Forest is tied up in Wilderness or potential wilderness designation. That seems more than adequate and I don't believe we need any more lands going towards designated wilderness in this new forest plan. I also feel that designating land as "backcountry" is undesirable as it just paves the way for future wilderness status. I strongly disagree with an grizzly bear relocation areas in the Crazies or any other area where there is not already an established population of resident grizzlies. Furthermore, I strongly disagree on including any sort of bison management or expansion provisions in the forest plan. The Forest Service in already stretched way beyond its capacity in terms of financial resources and man power. Perhaps the final draft of this plan should keep these realities in mind and keep it simple.
