Comments: The first time that I was going to walk across the Crazy Mountains, my friend told me that it was like Glacier Park with no people. I have since visited the Crazies dozens of times. I always see people now but it still has the wild feel that it always has. The fact that Chief Plenty Coups went there for his vision quests just makes it more magical and important to preserving for our history. It's a wild place easily accessible from Billings, Bozeman, and many of Montana's larger towns. Many of us go there to hunt, ski, hike, horseback ride, and gather our thoughts in order to do the right things for Montana and our communities. As population pressure increases, the small island range will play an increasing role in Montana's multibillion-dollar tourism industry. Please do the right thing for all generations to come and protect our access to the Crazies.

Thank you!
