

Data Submitted (UTC 11): 9/5/2019 11:57:30 PM

First name: Dustin

Last name: Zuffelato

Organization:

Title:

Comments: The Forest Service already has regulations for the river corridor including fires and human waste. Prior to imposing more rules, it would be important to simply enforce the current rules. With enforcement comes along time, funding, and basic infrastructure. I understand the difficulty for the forest service to obtain these resources but it appears unrealistic to think that if you don't have the resources to ensure the current rules are being followed, how will you have the resources to enforce even more rules. I personally think that human waste is the top priority to address. I propose starting with education and more monitoring and some infrastructure such as scat machines would be the first step before you start to impose even more rules. Improve the access points, improve and monitor the commonly used campsites. A permitting system limits use. The use just needs to be improved via education and infrastructure to mitigate impact. Dole out some fines for non compliance, the word will quickly get out and the users will quickly monitor each other. I appreciate the efforts because I agree the impact is becoming noticeably worse each year. But please take a simple approach and take things one step at a time. Step one is simply developing a plan to ensure the current rules and regulations are followed and most importantly educating and making it easy for folks to comply including scat machines.