Comments: The administration's rushed and reckless plan to allow clear-cutting and road-building in huge swaths of Alaska's Tongass National Forest will cause harm for generations to come. Tongass National Forest is not only a pristine national treasure, the largest intact temperate forest in the world, and a key part of local tourism and recreation economies - it is also one of our most effective tools to mitigate climate change for future generations. The vast majority of Americans want to see the Tongass protected.
