Comments: This is beyond reprehensible. This administration appears bent on the destruction of all the institutions that make this country such a profoundly wonderful place.

As a Veteran and former law enforcement, I am developing an ulcer thinking about the damage that is being done to the rule of law, to the environment, to the reputation of the country that I love. I'm not someone who normally waves the flag or makes a show of patriotism. But this administration is profoundly damaging to this country and this world.

We -- as a country, as a planet -- need places without roads. The transfer of genetic material alone is worth the money. The carbon sequestration is valuable, too. But beyond that, we need wild places. The uncut, unfarmed woodlands are part of the wealth of this country, and they belong not just to people who are alive today, but to the generations yet to come.

These lands do NOT belong to billionaires, or friends of the administration who "generously donate" for the right to rip off the taxpayers and future generations. They belong to everyone.
