Comments: The Tongass National Forest in southeast Alaska is the largest temperate rainforest in the world and the largest national forest in the US. At almost 17 million acres, it's a wonderland for hunting and fishing. There appears to be no good reason for removing this forest, any part of it, from the protected Roadless Conservation area except to further corporate profit. We, as Americans, have destroyed too much irreplaceable natural forests in our country. We must preserve what is left for the good of our children, our wildlife, our country and our planet. I vehemently oppose removing any part of this precious natural treasure from protected status.
