Comments: I believe 9.2 million acres of Alaskan forest should be closed to logging. The area should be better preserved for generations to come, and that can't happen with the destruction of mostly impossible-to-manufacture trees. Alaska's forests are important habitat for a variety of plant and animal species, and logging in the area could lead to extinction of some and/or the endangerment of others. It's also an incredibly important carbon store that the earth can't afford to lose. I think a better use of the forest would be in preservation, which could bring new forms of tourism to the area.

I may just be a student, but I want to try and elicit some change, however small it may be.

Thanks.
