Dear Willamette National Forest,

I recognize the necessity of controlling the volume of users for wilderness areas in the name of stewardship, in addition to the need to raise funds for appropriate maintenance and management. I also think a fee and permit system can be onerous, leading to discouragement of use of said areas. I am curious whether the forest service has explored other options, such as a suggested donation-based approach. I suspect this option has the promise of raising money in addition to providing emphasis on the need to limit or counteract human impact in heavily used areas.

Sincerely,

Robert deBurlo
