Comments: The idea of industrializing preserved public lands is a threat to nature. As modern humans, I believe nature is one of the only pure things that we have access to.

Building industry in wild areas poses a threat to wildlife, ecology and nearby indigenous populations. The idea is that it affects the food chain up until it reaches humans. This is harmful and a violation of human rights. By letting it happen, repurposing national land is becoming normalized, opening up areas deemed sacred by the Roosevelt administration through the antiquities act, to be used as a means of production for money. This mentality will continue until more and more protected areas become hubs for industry if not stopped. By current law, private organizations have no right to be on and profit off of public lands.

To those who work to manage this area, I demand you to be the swift hand of reason and do everything in your power to stop the destruction of this important ecosystem.
