Comments: At least we live in a country where comments like these potentially hold weight and can help define an outcome. I am a supporter of wild places staying wild and the roadless act, especially in the Tongass Forest. Although the logging industry is obviously prevalent and also important, when approached sustainably, for our culture of needs and infrastructure, there are all sorts of differing places where it is appropriate or inappropriate to go forth in such an industry. A forest such as the Tongass, is an inappropriate setting for clear cut practices. It is clearly controversial and has had a history of protection for a reason. These layers of protection should persist and continue for the future of keeping the treasured rainforest, in all its remaining old growth, pristine. Thank you!
