Comments: I believe we are far passed the time when there is a legitimate argument for cutting down our forests and wild space for the sake of profit and industry. The survival of our species as well as the places that countless other species call home is dependent upon leaving our forests untouched. Among other reasons, the scars of the timber industry left on our lands are just plain ugly. The profits for some eliminate so many opportunities for many for recreation, joy, and healing. The article I read makes a point that the recreation industry is much larger than the timber industry and so by trying to revive one, you'll be harming the other. Keep our wild places wild.
