Comments: There are only so many beautiful places left on Earth that have been untarnished by man. Alaska holds a number of them, and this forest is beautiful. How disgustingly irresponsible it would be of us to not only damage one of the most magical places in our country, but to ruin one thing that is helping keep our carbon footprint lower. Logging will soon be replaced by hemp, due to its less than sustainable practices. Are we to be a country that runs constantly behind the curve, or one that designs it. I think it's disgusting that the country of Teddy Roosevelt who so ardently fought for the creation of national parks, so that generations to come could enjoy the beauty of this vast and great country, is trying to become the country that ruins and destroys this beauty for their own pocketbook. It's high time business get out of politics, and as a government you do your job, which is to protect citizens and the land that gives us life.
