Comments: Please, please, please do not allow these forests that can be enjoyed my many and have such a positive impact on humanity to be destroyed for the sake of a few peoples' pocketbooks and at the indirect expense of many others (including other wealthy people--not just little people who do not matter as much to decision-makers). Instead, why not allow a more benevolent kind of rich person to promote tourism there without razing the forest? Kickbacks can still be gained for the less-than-perfect, but in a way that doesn't destroy the environment.
