Comments: It is not fair to offer the public such a short window to review and comment on this project. A project of this scope would take months if not years to plan and speaks of techniques and terms not commonly known by the general public. The government has the duty to not only inform the public of its intentions but to educate them as to what exactly their intentions are. Due to the size and scope of this project, the communication plan and the risk management plan should include informing and educating the public as to how this project will affect their land and to answer as many questions as possible. Operating inside a bubble without perspective is dangerous and will generate additional friction between the government and the public it serves.
