Comments: I am writing to urge you to not include packgoats with sheep for any restrictions because of fear of harming big horn sheep herds. Packgoats do not pose a threat. The science has shown they do not transmit pathogens to wild sheep besides the fact that the odds of packgoats being in a position to transmit are almost nil. They are always under the owners control and on their own stick close to them . This has been addressed in other national forests and the evidence is clear. Packgoats are a very minimal impact animal much less than horses or llamas. Regards. Bob Bryan
