Comments: I live by a lot of clear cut land, that has yet to be replanted for many years, despite Oregon's harsh replant policy. The land after about 5 years of being cut, still has little to no growth on it, in the means of shrubbery of course. On the hills where I live it has been clear cut for 4-5 years, and it gives the town a now bleak and gray appearance, as if it was devoid of all life. Despite all of this, if the plans are to clear cut for other native species to thrive such as huckleberries and other shrubs, there should be some planting, or encouragement of it, then I think it could be a good change of scenery.
