Comments: These proposed timber sales make absolutely no sense - they would create terrible impacts to the largest intact temperate rainforest left on Earth, a key habitat for numerous listed species that the Fish and Wildlife Service is sworn to protect, and a major carbon sink in the fight against climate change.

The cost of building roads and needed infrastructure is enormous, and would actually make these sales a financial loss for the American public. Serious impacts would be felt by the indigenous communities that live here, and the fishing and tourism industries, which make up a much larger share of the economy (26% vs. 1%) than logging.

It makes one wonder - why is the federal government pushing for this? Who will truly benefit? Whose pockets will see these profits?

Stop serving the special interests and start doing your job - to serve the great good of the American public, and to protect the natural resources that belong to all of us.
