Comments: What else is there to be said about the South Fork of the Salmon? It's wild free-flowing mountain water that feeds the Columbia River basin and terminates in the Pacific Ocean. But not before providing critical habitat for millions of Salmon and Trout and other native fish species. Not to mention the rest of the food chain that relies on the fresh water that flows through one of the largest wilderness areas in the United States. The proposed open pit mine, on Public Land, in one of the most sensitive, remote and wild places on the planet is literally the last thing that should be approved to operate here. We all live downstream. The opposite of what America and The West stands for. Wild and Free, no longer it shall be. It's unbelievably disturbing that this is even something that needs public comment. The answer is No. Hell No.
