Comments: Hi,

My father graduated in forestry at MSU, and after a time with the Farmers Home Administration helping farmers get loans and effectively improve their crop yields, he switched over to being a banking loans officer--to avoid all the Federal red tape. But it all the forms and regulations eventually caught up with him in banking also.

My uncle was a forest ranger, who became head ranger at Kaibab and McCloud, before being kicked upstairs to an office building in San Francisco.

I wonder if the Stibnite Gold Project will be a victim of terminal bureaucracy, or a beneficiary of finally being rewarded for going way above and beyond to do things right in the mine, and playing the approval game the nice way.

No is always the easy answer for an approval agency. Yes, gets things done. Sometimes that takes a bit of courage.

Thanks for considering the results of this mine going forward, and the motives of those wishing for more waiting and possibly squelching one of what seems to be one of the most carefully constructed and environmentally helpful projects ever put forward.
