Comments: This is an addendum to my earlier comment. I want to emphasize the importance of large old trees to the health of the forest and secondly the importance of disturbing the forest floor as little as possible. The below ground world of mycorrhizae are critical to a thriving forest and things such as bulldozing "fire breaks," building roads and significant tree removal with large equipment, impacting the soils and fragile mycorrhizae does not build forest health or "restore" healthy forests but makes them more prone to hardships. The "restoration" plan in parts reads more like an "exploitation" plan. I urge the planners to truly incorporate the latest scientific knowledge into all aspects of the plan and put extractive industry interests on the back burner.

Thank you for your consideration
