Comments: This is a tough situation. I enjoy dispersed shooting in the National forest as a free American. But I also see the need in this high density area for some sort of regulation. And without the necessary enforcement patrols and public education this is a pointless exercise. So I hope the National forest is committed to the funding of the patrols.

A few people will use the galleries but it is not the same experience.

Our company regularly uses the area for business. Our guests are certainly appalled at the desecration of the trees and areas. Luckily these areas are small and once you pass them you only here the bullets flying over the tops of our vehicles. We tell the guests it is a rare species of bird that lives here:)

The recreational shooters seem to self regulate and congregate in certain areas. Perhaps just clean up and area improvements in the existing rouge sites could provide the same impact and relief as building designated sites that are likely to be ignored.

I am not a robot. Thank you.
