Comments: I've hunted this area most every fall since 1986, and spent weeks, months, probably years hiking these hills and draws with my parents, kids, and friends. While I don't live in Montana anymore, it's still an amazing privilege to have access to this kind of public ground. A lot of the areas I'm familiar with on these maps have become very thick over the years and it's only a matter of time before there's another really bad fire in them, so thinning makes sense. The downside of this kind of work done in there in the past is the remnants of logging roads become driving tracks. Hopefully the efforts over the past 10 years or so to prevent vehicle travel off numbered trails can continue once this work is done; signage is good, physical obstructions are better. Thank you!
