Comments: When the native people of sacred and ancestral lands ask for more research about the potential environmental impacts of development for recreation that they did not seek or ask for, then the research should be conducted in a fair and considerate way that's inclusive to the people requesting it. Anything less is a disrespect to those people and the lands they wish to be in harmony with and protect. Humans are not entitled with the rights to build mountain coasters. Though they can be fun and bring in revenue / tourism, what is most important is that the land it's self continues to be protected to the upmost extent, and the people who have dedicated themselves to that land, who are native people, are respected throughout the process of considering any infrastructure changes.
