Comments: Unfortunately, like everything else that the previous administration did, this is trying to take the country back in time. We now know more about the damage that livestock grazing does. We also know that preserving wilderness is vital to the effort to combat climate change, and that livestock grazing is at odds with the Wilderness Act. If anything, livestock grazing should be reduced, not increased, so as to prioritize the recovery of imperiled or threatened species. It is imperative to protect biodiversity.

Any revisions should require a public process that complies with federal laws, especially the National Environmental Policy Act. This proposal runs directly counter to the Biden Administration's 30x30 land conservation agenda. These should be protected lands, and not given over to the commercial livestock industry. The Forest Service should do the right thing for our public lands, Wilderness, and wildlife...by dropping its proposed Rangeland Management Directives. Thank you.
