

Data Submitted (UTC 11): 11/12/2021 9:35:02 PM

First name: Marianne

Last name: Edain

Organization: Whidbey Environmental Action Network

Title:

Comments: Remember that part about wilderness being a place where humans visit but do not remain? And where power tools will not be used? Sadly, anthropogenic climate change and subsequent wildfires have had a devastating impact on our wilderness areas. The proposed "danger tree" clearing activities constitute the murder of a mugging victim. Yes, the victim is down. Yes, the victim has suffered grievous harm. That does not in any way justify further vandalism. The short and sweet answer is: HANDS OFF our wilderness areas. We know that the land will recover, but at its own rate. If it is necessary at some point to deal with invasive exotics, that can be addressed. Cutting down the burned trees, without giving them time to regenerate (which some will do) or to fall and decay over time will only exacerbate the alteration of the landscape. Because it is wilderness, the first consideration must be for the wilderness, not for the perceived safety needs of those transient human visitors.