Comments: I object to any organized logging of fire damaged forest areas. Unless a tree has the potential to individually and directly damage a roadway or public thoroughfare, there is no reason to allow it to be cut.

Logging of fire damaged areas caused irreparable ecological damage to areas that are highly sensitive. Forest fire recovery is a natural ecological state, and burned/fallen trees play a critical part in allowing forests to recover and grow following a fire. Additionally, the use of heavy equipment on fire-scarred earth fundamentally changes the makeup of the soil, and irrevocably damages the recovery of that area.

Do the right thing and deny permission to log burned areas of public lands wholesale. Fires have been happening as long as there have been forests; no matter what advocates may say, logging is neither necessary nor positive for fire affected forests.
