

Data Submitted (UTC 11): 3/25/2022 6:55:14 PM

First name: Mike

Last name: Emmet

Organization:

Title:

Comments: it is appalling to see ~80% of osv access being taken away. sleds aren't the most environmentally friendly machines, but they are a blip on the radar in comparison to the massive global corporations that are contributing to the vast majority of global pollution. there is no need to take it out on people just trying to enjoy public lands and the outdoors. it is a bummer that people that work for environmental organizations based out of cities far from the sierra are trying to shut down access for people that actually live here. and i say this as someone who cares very much about the well being of our environment. i would love to see more legitimate studies on the frog issue, because i find it hard to believe that riding on top of a deep sierra snowpack would have much of an effect. also, many of the areas that are being shutdown are very far out there, and i would imagine only a handful of people can out there under human power. and when one of them gets injured or their equipment breaks, i'm sure they will be thrilled when someone on a snowmobile shows up to give them a ride back to their car.