Comments: To whom it may concern,

I have been coming to New Hampshire in the summertime for 20 years now: as a camper, as a tourist, and as a hiking enthusiast. It is my hope that my family will continue to enjoy New Hampshire's natural beauty as part of America's great legacy to her children--a legacy that cannot be granted, but can easily be destroyed.

It would be a genuine shame to see the shore of Lake Tarleton desecrated by logging. From Kingswood Camp and the top of Mt. Piermont, the view across Lake Tarleton is one of the White Mountains in their purest form. The woods, farmhouses, and even lakefront property offer one of the most pleasant views to be found in all the White Mountains. I write to ask that you preserve this beautiful place, that the logging industry--while essential--does not need this particular swath of land. From a purely economic standpoint, Lake Tarleton generates tourist income from out of state in its role as home to two separate camps and as a beachfront destination. From an ethical standpoint, the land was already pledged to be left alone. From a globalist standpoint, we are entering a new stage of global warming, one in which wet bulb events have begun in India, wildfire has reached new heights in Australia and the West Coast, and winter patterns are already disrupted in Texas. Now is no time to make reckless changes to the environment we seek to maintain.

Sincerely,

Nick F.
