Comments: Preserve all large trees that are not an immediate danger. Large trees are important to preserve our environment and prevent further global warming. Large trees are also a habitat for endangered animal species. A study at OHSU said that cutting trees is the biggest danger--bigger than carbon emissions, because big trees suck up carbon. The biggest green trees don't burn as well as the undergrowth--they should be preserved to defend against fires. All in all, we need those trees, more than ever. It's fine to plant baby trees, but it could be 100 years before they can really help take care of our environment.
