I have attached a pdf of a 1987 (35 yrs ago) publication on an old-growth forest in southeastern Louisiana. The "Introduction" cites the criteria for "old-growth" for its time and worth consideration by the National Forest Service even though the forest is not on government land. This particular forest was not easily accessible due to owner hesitation. I believe the study core area is still intact even though I have not communicated with the owners in years. This "Zumurray" forest was (is?) owned by the family of that name and back well before my study of it. The patriarch was THE Chiquita Banana magnate making millions with his connections to the great banana growing areas in South America. Hope this info is helpful. And btw if it matters, I have been a member of Ecological Society of America (ESA) since the mid-1970s
