Comments: You have plenty of scientist to tell you about the many important reasons why we should preserve what's left of our old growth forest, and I'm not one of them. While I admitt I really like trees and I admitt that with me at least, the bigger the better. I say, what gives us the right to take something from future generations? Even if there were no climate change and we didn't desparetly need them to suck carbon out of the air, what gives us the right to remove forever from our posterity. Hasn't there been enough of that?
