Comments: Having been a regular user of the campground and trails of the Holland Lake area, it seems evident that this place is already at capacity of use. The campgrounds are always full as is the lodge parking at trail heads and the trails themselves are already crowded. Having more people in the lodge doesn't seem sustainable for that area which is valued highly because it isn't developed like the Seeley Lake community. Increasing development there would forever change what draws people there for the worse. The growth seen in other MT communities has already negatively impacted what people love about Montana. As a lifelong Montana resident, I will always stand for preserving the very thing that Montana is valued for - which has never been the crowded resorts of other states. Even the increased visitation in Glacier has shown a need for limits so that other users can appreciate nature for what it is and not have it ruined by overuse.
