Comments: Being a good steward of public lands means that you act mindfully to protect and nurture lands that are not yours, not mine, certainly not theirs, but everyone's. Allowing this type of construction is destruction. It can never be undone. This is NOT being good stewards of the land. This is a violation of your duty. And worse, it is a flagrant violation of what is ethically, morally and biologically right for this area of public land, promoting the belief that the Forest Service no longer employs educated and intelligent people.

Since I know several employees, I have to wonder where the approval for this misuse of public lands came from. Would you share?
