Comments: While it is totally logical that the lodge should be improved, there is no feasible need for expansion other than a company from Colorado looking to make a cash grab from land they do not even live on. Holland lake is already a highly trafficked destination, and with the amount of people that already recreate there this puts pressure on the forest and wildlife. Not to mention that the Holland lake area is an important habitat for bears in the mission complex that we can be sure will find plenty of improperly stored food and even more contact with people. Montana has enough pressure from tourism on our natural resources and while I understand ecotourism is the bulk of where our state makes its money from, I'm concerned as someone who actually lives here and calls this place home, that we are putting too much pressure on that resource, and unfortunately destroying it for the highest bidder.
