Comments: I have pack tripped into the Bob from the trailhead across the lake. Sometimes we drive up to Holland Lake for lunch. It is a pristine, if a bit rustic, get away and even motorboats seem out of place. This mega development is done with all the care of a unmanned bulldozer with its throttle stuck wide open.

One thing I could not find on the plans is where the sewage treatment plant is. Certainly all this development will have an affect on the water quality of the lake and, being so close to the shore, the typical septic systems do not have a good record of mitigating pollution. And we can count on increased water degradation and noise pollution from the increased boating especially those aimless and annoying PWCs. Who is addressing this? Not the Forest Service if there are plans to rush this through without an EIR.

Please do not welcome this project no matter how much money they offer you. This can be done in a much more sensitive and conscientious manner but then the out of state developers won't be able to squeeze every last dime out of it. After all, they will take the profit, sell it to another corporation, and move on once it is done. Tell me this hasn't ever happened before. Don't play us for chumps.
