Comments: I would hope that the Forest Service would not just rubber stamp it's approval for this project. I also hope that nothing happens without the review of a full EIS study which would include waste disposal and water usage impact. The highway through this area is already busy during the summer months and is noted as a high accident corridor. Additional lanes to accommodate increased traffic would further degrade environmental quality. Concerning to me is this proposed large footprint development's close approximation to our cherished Bob Marshall Wilderness complex. Least concerning to me is the inevitable promise of how this may "benefit" the local economy. As evidenced by other resorts of this nature, the "benefits" to the local population tend to hover and linger in the vicinity of the poverty line, while subsequent increased property values push established low income families away. As the author, Edward Abbey once pointed out, what some may call growth might also be referred to by others as a cancer. As a Montanan, I assert that what may be welcomed in Colorado, Utah and Big Sky should not and will not be welcomed here. Sadly, when the environment is in conflict with big money; it is the magnetic lure of money and the promise of short-term gains that generally hold the high cards. I am less than optimistic that this proposed rich man's resort will be an exception. The developers should be encouraged to find a place which will result in less negative environmental impact. That Holland Lake was even considered is ludicrous.
