Comments: The open wilderness of the Holland Lake area is worth far more to locals and visitors alike left intact than it will be as a developed and exclusive resort for the elite and ultra-rich developers hoping to destroy one of the last truly wild and accessible areas of the state. We do not need another over-priced company taking over the shores of another node of water, like has happened on the Blackfoot river.

The historic buildings must also be left intact, and as little development as possible allowed. This is one of the most beautiful pieces of preserved wilderness they've seen in one location so close to so many developed areas, but also truly sacred and special ground that deserves to be respected.

It is some of the best wildlife habitat with easy accessibility for the non-backpacker. Any development of this special place would be a travesty to the people of Montana and our public lands, and will truly show that out-of-state developers know nothing of our local interests, which has already been proven time and time again.

The forest service must protect this land, and strike down any development on this refuge for the people of Montana, and our wildlife alike."
