Comments: In the fall of 2015, I was below the lower lake, just above the timberline when I spotted a dead buck in the brush. I went over to examine him and saw his neck was slashed open and that rigor mortis had not set in.

Immediately worried, I looked around and smelled musk. Just in front of me, about 100 yards was a wolverine. One of the few that exist in the lower-48. I imagine this new facility will drive them from the area, if you do not think so, I wonder why you think that.

At the top of the mountain, there were mountain goats, another creature that isn't far from the precipice of extirpation in Montana... Will this lodge really bolster what makes Montana, Montana? Or will it lend itself to becoming more like Colorado?
