Comments: As someone who has been involved in land development and understands the need for growth - I have concerns about what is being proposed.

Environmental Impact studies are an integral part of maintaining public confidence in the planning and growth of our state. Not to be dismissed are the issues that can surface during such an investigation. A developer should want one - to reduce unforeseen and unmitigable realities. A body governing the land, well the reasons are the foundation of the stewardship you represent.

Access, while there are many beautiful mountain lakes in Montana. Holland Lake offers accessibility to a lake that feels untouched. Residents of our state and visitors who are not afforded the ability to hike in - can drive into Holland and experience something rare.

Holland is rare, and while I know that emotions do not hold weight in the debate, we should not turn away from what is at cost here. You can't recreate what will be lost.
